A nuclear bomb rips the city apart.

A hacker and a pre-med college student make the unlikely pair, but beggars can't be choosers in a nuclear apocalypse. Midge and Danny might have escaped the blast of a nuclear bomb, but they're anything but safe.

It's a life and death race against the clock.

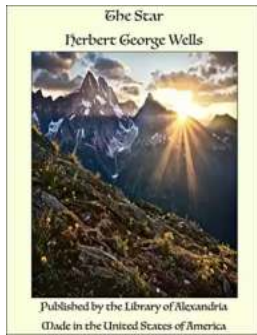

With radiation rushing their way in the form of nuclear fallout, two horses and an antiquated carriage are their only means of escape. If they don't find cover soon, they'll suffer a slow and agonizing death no medicine can cure.

Could you drop everything to save yourself?

Miles from home and without any friends or family nearby, Midge and Danny will have to rely on the kindness of strangers to survive. If they don't choose their friends carefully, they might not live long enough to find Midge's mother or determine if her sister survived.

The attack is only the beginning.

Duck for Cover is book two in Nuclear Survival: Northern Exposure, a post-apocalyptic thriller series following ordinary people struggling to survive after a nuclear attack on the United States plunges the nation into chaos.
