

Remembering Robert Evans: The By George Collection

Robert Evans was a legendary film producer, a larger-than-life figure who left an indelible mark on Hollywood. The news of his passing on October 26, 2019, left many in the industry mourning his loss and reflecting on his incredible contributions. In memory of this iconic producer, we will explore the By George Collection, a testament to Evans' unique vision and genius.

The Rise of Robert Evans

Robert Evans started his career as an actor, starring in films such as "Man of a Thousand Faces" and "The Sun Also Rises." However, it was his transition to producing that would define his legacy. In 1966, Evans became the head of production at Paramount Pictures, making him the youngest studio executive in Hollywood history at the time.

At Paramount, Evans spearheaded the production of several critically acclaimed and commercially successful films. Titles like "Rosemary's Baby," "The Godfather," and "Chinatown" were just a few examples of his remarkable portfolio. Evans had an unmatched ability to identify talent and bring the best out of them, earning him respect and admiration throughout the industry.

Canadian newspaper columnist and television executive George Anthony shares his close encounters with Hollywood royalty and show business legends in a series of intimate memoirs showcasing such diverse talents as Doris Day, Bette Davis, William Holden, Peggy Lee, Joan Rivers, Burt Reynolds, Ginger Rogers and Mae West, to name only a few.

In this instalment Anthony tries to expedite a creative partnership between two personal friends -- producer and studio chief Robert Evans and singer-songwriter Peter Allen -- for a film that Evans is developing with one of Hollywood's top writers. So what could possibly go wrong?

Anthony's valiant attempts to put them together prove once again that Irving Berlin was right: There's still no business like show business.
