The Dawn of a Threatened Legacy

In the early 1900s, North America witnessed a rapid decline in the populations of several horse breeds renowned for their beauty and grace. Among these captivating equines were the Appaloosas, Arabians, American Paints, and Morgans. Once proudly roaming the vast landscapes of America, these horses became endangered due to various reasons, including habitat loss, human intervention, and indiscriminate breeding.

Understanding the dire consequences of losing such a cultural and natural heritage, a brave group of individuals formed an underground organization known as "The Equine Guardians." Operating discreetly under the radar, their primary objective was to rescue, protect, and revive these breathtaking horse breeds against all odds.

A thrilling account of one of the strangest and most daring missions in American history.

In the final days of World War II, with the ravenous Red Army marching across Czechoslovakia, a band of American soldiers did something unusual. They went behind enemy lines and teamed up with a group of Nazi officers to save one of the world's rarest and most beautiful horses. The breeding mares of the white Lippizaner, whose bloodlines date back centuries, were in imminent danger of extinction. After witnessing scenes of death and destruction while fighting across France and Germany, the Americans decided "to do something beautiful" and rescue this fragile piece of world culture.

Based on personal interviews and new archival research, NY Times bestselling author Stephan Talty recreates the rescue mission in vivid detail.
