Mission to the New Hebrides

In 1858, John Paton left everything he knew and loved behind and set sail for the South Pacific. His destination: the New Hebrides (present-day Vanuatu), a group of islands inhabited by cannibalistic tribes and steeped in pagan rituals.

Paton arrived on the island of Tanna, where he faced unimaginable challenges and dangers. He encountered hostility from the natives, who saw him as a threat to their way of life. Disease, hunger, and violence became constant companions as he tirelessly worked to spread the message of love and salvation.

His life was constantly in danger, as he narrowly escaped multiple attempts on his life. Yet, Paton's faith remained unshakable. He firmly believed that God had called him to share the Gospel with these people, regardless of the cost.

The Power of Love

One of the most remarkable aspects of John Paton's mission was his unwavering love for the people he served, even in the face of extreme adversity. Rather than viewing the natives as savages to be conquered, Paton saw them as lost souls in need of salvation.

He learned their language, embraced their culture, and showed them the love of Christ through his actions. Paton's compassion and selflessness would eventually win over the hearts of many islanders, who renounced their former ways and embraced Christianity.

With each conversion, Paton's resolve was strengthened. His perseverance in the face of constant danger and his unyielding dedication to the cause of Christ became a shining example for missionaries around the world.
